This conference explores the role of national civil societies and transnational advocacy networks in the struggle to hold accountable economic actors for their involvement in massive infringement of human rights, ranging from genocide and war crimes, to torture and forced labor, and to extreme environmental degradation. It examines a variety of NGOs, epistemic communities, trade unions, and grassroots movements which seek justice across the world, and the ways their strategies are informed by different national and regional contexts and diverse ideological and professional understandings of accountability processes.

The conference aims to answer the following questions:

- How do different actors around the globe mobilize for corporate accountability, what repertoires do they adopt, whom do they address, and with what results?
- How do different local, national, regional, transnational, and/or trans-local contexts, with their diverse political, socio-economic, and cultural diversity affect strategies of corporate accountability?
- What is the interplay between national and transnational mobilizations of advocacy groups?
